The gender pay gap between women’s and men’s average net hourly earnings has been established in many articles, but does it also hold for entrepreneurs? We investigate whether female entrepreneurs pay themselves as much as men and whether there are heterogeneous effects when we differentiate between solo entrepreneurs and employers on the one hand and employees and managers on the other.

Alexander Kritikos is Research Director for Entrepreneurship at the German Institute for Economic Research (DIW Berlin), Professor of Economics at the University in Potsdam, and Research Fellow at the IZA, Bonn. His research interests are in Innovation & entrepreneurship, as well as in experimental economics. His research is published in the leading international journals on entrepreneurship and innovation.